Proponents for the Institution of Montana Prostitution

Although prostitution is often viewed within Montanan society as immoral, its legalization would not only benefit the men and women employed within the trade, but the society of Montana as a whole. Proponents for the Institution of Montana Prostitution realize the potential prosperity that legalization could bring. Nevada, as well as many countries within the European Union, have also realized these benefits, and have been liberalizing prostitution laws for the economic gain and safety of all.

Great Britain, the latest European country to join the liberalizing trend, is a rather potent example. Parliament recently passed a law legalizing brothels to contain up to three prostitutes working under the supervision of an employer. Primarily, the previously dangerous practice of prostitution, which inevitably would exist, whether or not laws allow it, is made safer due to background checks and other measures to root out wayward customers. The men and women of the profession no longer have to fear serious injury or death while working because of these measures. Secondly, taxation can stimulate the local economy. Great Britain is already seeing the monetary, as well as societal benefits of legalized brothels within its borders, and Montana can too. Finally, prostitution will continue whether it is legal or not, so why not take a part in the monetary rewards or make the inevitable profession safer for its workers?

This societal transition can be made with class and consideration and bring unforeseen opportunities to Montana, while simultaneously making current practices safer.
